Executive Summary

This evaluation is motivated by the San Francisco Arts Commission’s (SFAC) desire to capture the impact of the Street Artists Program (SAP) and identify strategies to improve program alignment with the agency’s 2014-2019 Strategic Plan. As such, it is guided by four key questions.

1. Who is being served by the Street Artists Program?
2. How effectively/efficiently is the program being administered?
3. What aspects of the program do not align with SFAC priorities?
4. How will program realignment impact stakeholders (financially, professionally, personally)?

The evaluation identified three critical issues that should be addressed to align the Program with the Arts Commission’s 2014-2019 Strategic Plan. The quality of products sold through the Program is inconsistent, monitoring and enforcement mechanisms are inefficient and ineffective, and Program outcomes do not align with the Agency’s mandate to promote the employment of artists and those skilled in crafts.

The following recommendations aim to address these issues and allow the program to be more responsive to the changing demographic of the artists it seeks to serve:

- Improve quality control mechanisms with the institution of a juried selection process for Program artists, and a partnership with the Office of Small Business to serve Program vendors who do not meet juried selection criteria.
- Implement contemporary art market structure to improve public awareness of the program with the establishment of three Open Air Markets; promotion of a reinvigorated art & craft market with clearly branded marketplaces, a program name that reflects the program purpose, and launching a platform for Program artists to display their work in SFAC galleries.
- Enhance Program services to support professional artists by creating capacity building and technical assistance program components.
Introduction

The San Francisco Arts Commission (SFAC) has recently started a five year Strategic Plan that establishes the agency’s commitment to data-driven decision-making and consistent program evaluation, a pathway that ensures the SFAC portfolio of programs remains relevant, useful, and meaningful for the diverse and ever-changing San Francisco population. The Plan identifies agency priorities and goals as well as a strategy to guide the agency’s stewardship of the San Francisco arts ecosystem and ensure that the city continues to be “a vibrant place where the arts and culture flourish.”

This assessment of the Street Artists Program (SAP) is a reflection of the SFAC’s investment in improving program administration to continually meet the shifting needs of professional artists. The key questions aim to measure program impacts, and identify gaps between program outcomes and agency priorities. The recommendations that follow are intended to revitalize and align SAP with the Agency’s mission to administer programs that invest in our communities, enliven the urban environment and develop innovative policy.

Thanks to the many program stakeholders who took the time to share their valuable insights, this report captures the unique contributions this program provides to the San Francisco arts ecosystem, and identifies a path to maintaining the Program’s strengths while pursuing programmatic improvements that will better serve the San Francisco arts community.

The Arts & Crafts Sector in the 21st Century

Under the direction of the SFAC, the SAP provides licenses to local artists to sell their work in designated areas throughout the city. In 1972, the Street Artist Program was established under Proposition L, legislation that addressed the demands of activists who sought a legal avenue to sell their art and craftwork on city sidewalks. During that tumultuous period, the Street Artists Ordinance (Police Code Article 24, Section 2400, see Appendix C) legitimized art and craft vendors, establishing their right to make a living by selling their work to the public. Since the program’s inception over 40 years ago, the art and craft movement has leapt into the 21st century, pushing political, social, and economic boundaries and shaping physical and virtual communities of artists and makers.²

The 21st century craft movement has grown virtually, through websites like Etsy.com, blogs, and online stores, as well as through physical space with a growing number of boutiques, pop-up shops, galleries, fairs, and outdoor markets. Art & craft markets have flourished across the nation, catering to the desires of DIY enthusiasts and millennial consumers. From Seattle to Brooklyn, juried selection and strategic promotion build vibrant market destinations bustling with diverse communities of makers and patrons. Often, both producers and consumers of local art and craftwork are motivated by a political cause. Desires to support their local economy, take a stand against sweatshop labor practices, or fight the environmental impacts of mass production fuel the arts and crafts sector. Alongside political impacts, the economic impact of this movement is considerable, with the arts and crafts sector constituting a $30 billion market.³

Although generations of Bay Area residents have created, shared, and cherished the work sold through SAP, the law and licensing criteria that govern the Program have remained relatively unchanged over the decades while the city – both in terms of physical space and demographics – is changing rapidly. Unable to reinvent itself and establish programmatic relevance in this dynamic urban community, the Program has become siloed within the agency as the SFAC works to become more effective and responsive to community needs through its strategic plan.

As “the City agency that champions the arts as essential to daily life,” SFAC values artists as “integral to making San Francisco a city where people want to live, work and play,”⁴ and promotes the public understanding of “arts as critical to a healthy democracy and innovative government.”⁵ As a program born from artists’ vision, SAP is poised to enliven our city, make high quality art experiences equitable and easily accessible, and create fertile ground for building socially diverse and politically engaged communities of artists and neighbors. By addressing the key program issues outlined in this report, and closing the gaps between program impacts and the SFAC’s priority goals, SAP can play a central role in furthering the SFAC’s mission and vision for the City and County of San Francisco. In addition, by tapping into the contemporary arts market model and promoting the political and social relevance of this artisan market, the SFAC can revitalize SAP and establish a modern urban arts market that reflects the passion of the program’s founders and the city’s need for diverse, high-quality art.

Key Findings

Methodology

This evaluation is guided by four key questions, which aim to measure the impact of the Program as well as identify the gaps between the Program outcomes and the Agency’s vision.

1. Who is being served by the Street Artists Program?
2. How effectively/efficiently is the program being administered?
3. Which aspects of the program do not align with SFAC priorities?
4. How will program realignment impact stakeholders (financially, professionally, personally)?

This report relies on (1) qualitative data collected from interviews with key stakeholder groups, including program participants, program staff, commissioners, and screening panelists; (2) quantitative data analyzed from program budgets and reports, and participant survey responses; (3) publicly available literature on relevant research and program models. Topics discussed with interviewees and survey participants included the strengths of SAP, critical issues facing the Program, and gaps between Program outcomes and SFAC agency goals. A detailed description of the evaluation methodology is available in Appendix D.

Findings

The specific themes that arose from the study are presented in the table below:
Program Strengths
- Creates opportunity
- Professional development
- Earned income

Critical Issues
- Inconsistent quality of products
- Program processes are inefficient and ineffective
- Program outcomes are inconsistent with agency mandate

Program Recommendations
- Improve quality control mechanism
- Implement market structure
- Enhance program services
Strengths

SAP creates opportunity and provides participants with a singular and unique avenue to access and participate in the arts economy. Stakeholders identified various program components that set this program apart from similar art & craft markets, municipal vendor programs, and the gallery system. These include the low barriers to entry in the program, very affordable program fees and a minimally bureaucratic process to obtain a license. Program participants are given access to desirable selling locations throughout the city, with heavy pedestrian traffic. This is one of the key reasons the Street Artists license is preferred to the peddler permit program run through the San Francisco Police Department. Vendors in the peddler permit program are restricted by regulations that isolate them from commercial establishments and make it difficult for vendors to access customers.

Stakeholders consistently reference the informal education and training networks that they access through program participation. Participants have built a professional network of artists through the Program. Artists learn about new opportunities to show their work, better places to source their material, and improved methods to execute their craft. The Street Artists market has become a training ground for emerging artist entrepreneurs to learn how to build their brand, market and display their work, how to price their work, and how to identify their consumer audience.

“Competition, networking with other Artists about craft fairs, material sources, [and] craft techniques is an excellent free education which I have been happy to be a part of.” – Program Artist

The artists in these professional networks create work across 38 categories of craftwork. Participants are exposed to a wide variety of techniques, expertise, and capacities. Although there is increasing replication throughout the program as vendors learn they can be particularly lucrative producing low-cost beaded jewelry, nameplate necklaces, and crochet animal hats, the Program continues to host a diversity of artistic perspectives and tastes. By improving the selection process and simplifying monitoring processes, the SFAC can maintain the diversity of work within the program and mitigate replication within the artists’ markets (see further discussion on page 14).

The majority of program artists earn relatively substantial income from sales. With an annual payment of the $696 fee (less if paying for three quarters of the year or less), the majority of participants sell more than $10,000 of their work. This is in spite of what many participants described as “dwindling sales” at the Street Artists markets. These self-reported sales figures illustrate that the Street Artists Market has the potential to be a significant source of income to the city’s increasingly vulnerable artist community. With the cost of living and real estate steadily on the rise, artists and craftspeople are facing difficult choices about long-term sustainability in this city. The SFAC has the opportunity to strategically strengthen and promote the Street Artists markets to increase artists’ sales and stem the loss of Program participants escaping the declining market quality (see further discussion on page 16).

Critical Issues

Although the program was born from the demand of artists, the number of program participants has been steadily in decline for the past five years. Participants reasoned that it has become increasingly difficult to make a living through the program. Increasing competition from vendors selling inexpensive goods has pushed many artists to opt out of the program.

Despite this trend, no changes have been implemented to address the current needs of potential participants due to the rigid structure of the Street Artists Ordinance, which prescribes nearly every facet of the Program. Every programmatic process, from licensing and monitoring, to budgeting and marketing, is regulated, in detail, by the over-forty year old ordinance. Programmatic stagnation yields inefficient and ineffective program administration. These issues have compounded over the last forty years and manifested in several ways: the quality of work sold through the program is inconsistent, monitoring and enforcement mechanisms are ineffective, and Program resources are increasingly spent to serve non-artist vendor populations.

The quality of work sold through the program is inconsistent.
Every stakeholder group mentioned the influx of “buy and sell” vendors in the program. The observation that vendors are in fact buying bulk items like crocheted Hello Kitty™ hats and beaded jewelry has not been substantiated. However, there is a large number of vendors selling items that are also sold in chain stores and tourist shops throughout the city. In many cases, these items are indeed being made by the vendors and therefore must be allowed in the program based on the existing licensing criteria. However, the large number of copyrighted material being sold at every designated market creates a legal and ethical gray area and compromises the artistic integrity of the Program.

“Overall the quality of work from new artists is sub-standard. It is dubbed Street Art, handmade, etc...but, we are inundated with knockoffs and cheap imitations and resale merchandise. It brings the quality of the entire event down.”

Monitoring and enforcement mechanisms are inefficient and ineffective

The cumbersome screening criteria and process is the city’s best effort to support the artistic integrity of the program without over-stepping the very limiting language of the Street Artists Ordinance. The long list of criteria used to screen participants creates a circuitous path that does not result in high-quality artisan crafts being consistently presented to community-patrons. Instead, the screening panel spends hours confirming whether each participant is hand-making their wares or deciphering if the alterations made to a candle, or hat, or sock are significant (i.e. the item is 51% changed – a quantitative measure assigned to a very subjective decision). A jeweler who places a single bead on an earring will not be granted a license, but two beads may suffice. On the other hand, a skilled crocheter making Hello Kitty™ hats from an online pattern will receive a license despite the fact that their work is in violation of copyright law.

Staff reported that at least 40% of their time is spent on monitoring and enforcement efforts. This includes the weekly time spent walking through the city’s designated selling areas to inspect that artists are only selling the wares they have been approved to sell, that artist’s displays do not violate the Program’s size criteria, and that only approved artists (and their family unit) are selling in the designated areas. In addition, staff spends large amounts of time writing violations and gathering evidence to present at violation hearings. Despite the colossal staff effort to enforce the ordinance, few violators are successfully held accountable for violations and serial offenders are rarely removed from the program. Unlike any other program in the Commission’s portfolio, the Street Artist Ordinance gives the final word on enforcement to The Board of Permit Appeals.

Program outcomes are inconsistent with agency mandate

The SFAC’s Charter imbues the agency with the responsibility to “promote the employment of artists and those skilled in craft.” Artists and the work they produce are essential to the city’s identity and economy, and the SFAC is the singular municipal agency mandated to address the needs of professional artists and craftspeople. The critical issues discussed above are symptoms of the overall shift in the participant population served through SAP, a shift that results in SFAC resources being diverted away from artists.

Over the last 40 years, the SFAC has started to serve two divergent groups through the licensing program: Professional Artists and Vendor Entrepreneurs. These groups are different in some key ways. Some are visual: professional artists are selling unique goods that they make on their own and can only be found at their kiosk. Vendor entrepreneurs sell goods that are commonly found in stores, tourist shops, or jewelry chains like Claire’s®. Vendor entrepreneurs often sell copyrighted goods like Hello Kitty™ hats, or SF Giants™ t-shirts. Another clear difference is the price of their goods: Professional Artists price their goods to reflect the cost of their labor, as well as their materials. Vendor entrepreneurs price their goods with the same calculation, but they are often able to buy their goods in bulk, ready-made, and as a result, are able to set their prices quite low.

The differences between these two groups are meaningful because they drastically shift the character of the markets. Vendors’ kiosks are often piled high with imported goods, a signal to the public who mistake the Street Artist Markets for flea markets. As a result, patrons expect flea market prices and are unwilling to purchase quality art at the requisite price. Consequently, it has become more difficult for artists to make a living through the markets. In this way, the Program is increasingly failing to fulfill the agency’s mandate to promote the employment of artists. (Further discussion on page 16)

Program Recommendations

As an avenue for local artists and craftspeople to make a living from their work – SAP acts as an investment in a vibrant arts community. The energetic markets and artful displays created by program participants enliven the urban environment and build public awareness about the value and benefits of the arts. Recommendations to Create a 21st Century Urban Art Market

The recommendations that follow rely on the concept of the arts ecosystem and the SFAC’s capacity to leverage the various roles it plays in the city’s art ecosystem. The recommendations detailed in this report focus on utilizing SFAC’s capacities as an administrator, and the curatorial capacity of the Screening Committee.

The public panel is a key part of the agency’s two biggest programs, Public Art and grantmaking. Utilizing experts in the field, the public panel selection process establishes minimum qualifications for consideration, while maintaining the flexibility to make decisions based on the quality and originality of submitted works. As a result, public panels serve the agency mandate to provide a vibrant, diverse, and high-quality art experience to the San Francisco community.

The Bay Area’s Arts Advocacy Coalition defines the curator as “providing a platform to share the work, they are the tastemakers and promoters of the industry, and they are the meeting point between artist and viewer.”

The screening process currently employed in SAP relies on the expertise of a Mayoral appointed Advisory Committee of Street Artists and Crafts Examiners. As discussed earlier, however, the selection criteria focuses less on the quality of the work and more on the percentage of labor. By elevating quality as a key selection criteria and maintaining the public panel process, the screening committee can showcase the diverse perspectives, training, and expression of Street Artists vendors. The SFAC has the opportunity to elevate SAP as a platform for local artists to build professional success, and promote the Street Artist Markets as the meeting point for a diverse community of local artists to share their work with the people of San Francisco.

- Improve quality control mechanisms

  1.1 Revising the selection criteria

  Implementing a public panel selection process will align SAP with the SFAC portfolio of programs – most notably grantmaking and public art. When selecting artists to participate, particular consideration should be given to:

  - Quality
  - Originality
  - Diversity of Market Goods

  Quotas should be established for each category of craft (painting, photography, mixed-media, jewelry, pottery, metal-work, wood-work, leather-work, etc.) to establish an attractive mix of goods at market and ensure representation of a wide-variety of artistic practices.

Currently, program participants practice a diverse array of craftwork that fits broadly into four categories: Visual Art, Jewelry, Clothing & Accessories, and Miscellaneous Designed Objects. including everything from kites and dishware, to dog collars and candleholders. These four broad categories of creative products each account for roughly a quarter of the work sold through the program. This mix of goods reflects supply and demand market forces as artists create according to both their desire and their experience of what patrons are likely to purchase. Juried-selection should seek to maintain this current mix of market goods while striving to increase the diversity and quality of specific products within each category.

1.2 Vendor entrepreneurs are given an expanded avenue to access peddler permits through the SF Office of Small Business

The Street Artist Program is currently serving two disparate populations – Professional Artists and Vendor Entrepreneurs. The SFAC is the municipal agency responsible for serving the needs of professional artists and the broader arts ecosystem. There are other city agencies that are mandated to serve the needs of the broader community of entrepreneurs and small business owners. The San Francisco Office of Small Business is positioned to serve the needs of the community of vendors often referred to as “Buy and Sell” merchants by Program artists. These Vendor Entrepreneurs sell items through the program that technically meet the “handmade” criteria, but fall short of the originality and quality standards that the SFAC values.

The Office of Small Business was recommended as a preferable agency to administer the Street Artist Program in the 2011-2012 Civil Grand Jury report, “Where there is Smoke…”. At that time, some program participants did not support the program transfer. However, if the program successfully implements a process of juried selection for program artists, some individuals would no longer be qualified to sell their work through the program. Juried-selection will have financial and professional impacts on vendors who do not meet the improved selection criteria. However, these impacts can be mitigated by allowing continued use of designated selling areas located outside of the market sites. The agency should work with the Office of Small Business to ensure that these vendors continue to sell goods in San Francisco. The approximately 50 designated selling areas that are not located in the three recommended “Open Air Markets” (discussed on page 16) could be used by the Office of Small Business for use by this community of small businesspersons.

- Implement contemporary art market structure to improve public awareness of the program

  Stakeholders at every level of the program voiced concerns that the public is unaware or misinformed about the program. The SFAC needs to establish a coherent narrative to build public awareness of the program purpose. This narrative must be reinforced at all levels of the program, clearly articulating to the public the value and benefit of patronizing a local artisan market and supporting this San Francisco community of artists and craftspeople.

  2.1 Establish Three central “Open Air Markets”

  Establishing three open-air markets will concentrate traffic to artists’ kiosks. Currently, the most competitive selling areas for Program artists are located at Fisherman’s Wharf and Justin Herman

Urban Arts Market: An Evaluation of the Street Artists Program

Plaza. Artists selling at these markets benefit from their proximity to other vendors – the market model breeds competition and cooperation, and creates a destination that attracts large numbers of patrons.

Program Markets should be located in the areas where current designated selling spaces are clustered. These are 1) Fisherman’s Wharf, 2) Justin Herman Plaza (with an expansion to include nearby spaces at Market to Spear Street, Market, Drumm to Steuart, and the Café Spaces on Market Street) 3) Hallidie Plaza (including spaces at Market and 5th). Currently, these Markets areas include 361 selling spaces.

Implementing a simplified market model has the potential to improve staff’s quality control efforts, simplify Program promotion, and increase artistic productivity and efficiency. Program staff will be able to focus their monitoring efforts on three clearly demarcated markets rather than spot-checking the various clusters of selling areas that are currently dispersed across the city. Moving to a juried-selection model will compound these efficiency gains in the monitoring process (see page 14 for more detail). In addition, having three, distinct, open-air markets simplifies the promotional strategy for the SFAC. Each market can be promoted as a defined place that caters to a distinct customer – quirky & unique, politically aware & fashionable, and quintessentially San Francisco. The SFAC can promote these markets as a meeting place for artists, patrons, and the community at large to learn about the diverse array of artistic production happening in their city.

Lastly, creating space for artists to locate together supports healthy competition and cooperation among these professional artists. Many artists working at Justin Herman Plaza and Fisherman’s Wharf described their “free education” experience in their survey responses. Artists learn about new opportunities to show their work, better places to source their material, and improved methods to execute their craft. The Street Artists market is a training ground for emerging professional artist to learn how to build their brand, market and display their work, how to price their work, and how to identify their consumers. This positive impact can be encouraged and strengthened by creating a third market and focusing future expansion efforts on these three areas.

There are additional considerations to be made when developing this market model. Firstly, the SFAC must formalize an agreement with the San Francisco Recreation & Parks Agency before increasing investment to improve the market at Justin Herman Plaza. The current agreement between the agencies is tenuous and will not allow the SFAC to promote this market with on-site branding. If the SFAC is not able to clearly brand and demarcate the market space as an Urban Art Market, the value of the market model will be compromised. Secondly, this market model will decrease the available number of selling areas by fifty and consequently increase competition for spaces. On one hand, if juried-selection is implemented, this competition will improve the overall quality of the markets, allowing the SFAC to select participants based on specific standards of originality, creativity, and quality. On the other hand, increasing competition for fewer selling spaces will curb the level of access that participants currently enjoy. The public panel will have to make considerations to ensure that this competition equitably impacts artists across disciplines and demographics.

Lastly, the SFAC should strongly consider limiting market days to three days per week (Friday – Sunday). Currently, less than 25% of Program participants utilize the designated selling spaces more often than three days a week.11 The vast majority of Program participants (over 75%)12 come to market for three days a week or less. Participants explained that if vendors are hand-making everything that they sell, they must spend time each week on their craft in order to replenish their inventory. As a result, they are only able to come to market a few days a week. Limiting market days to the weekend will meet the needs of professional artists; liberate monitoring and enforcement resources, and help concentrate pedestrian traffic by differentiating market-days from the everyday.

As previously discussed, the juried-selection process will streamline the Program’s monitoring and enforcement process. In addition, part-time market managers,

11 The Street Artists Program Participant Survey (2015)
employed by the city, should be responsible for monitoring, enforcement during each market day. The combined efforts of the panel and market managers will increase the efficacy of monitoring and enforcement mechanisms and the improve quality of the arts markets. The overall improvement in market quality will attract artists and patrons alike, and professional artists will benefit as their sales, networks, and businesses grow. These artists will be able and willing to invest back into the Program through fees, to ensure that the Program continues to promote the employment of professional artists and craftspeople.

2.2 Supply program participants with SFAC branded kiosks to display and sell their work in designated areas.

The Program can catalyze the SFAC’s brand to promote the markets and Program artists by supplying participants with branded kiosks and clearly demarcating selling areas with SFAC branded signage. Branded kiosks will have the threelfold impact of promoting and legitimizing the program to the uninformed public, improving the display of art and crafts, and differentiating between market artists and sellers without licenses.

Branding the program can happen in various ways by shaping the physical market space. These options have widely different price implications and visual impacts. Purchasing branded kiosks and requiring participants to rent SFAC branded kiosks for market use would be the more expensive and require the most administrative support. A second option would be to firmly enforce the stall criteria that currently exist and place SFAC branded signs and banners to demarcate the Street Artists markets. This is considerably less expensive, requires an improved monitoring system with requisite staff support, and will allow for more flexibility in artists displays. However, more flexibility leaves room for display violations and poor-quality displays which will negatively impact the integrity of the market.

Stakeholders identified the market manager and lottery systems as problematic in several ways: 1) Market managers are volunteers who donate large amounts of time to running the lotteries and acting as liaisons between the artists, program staff, and commissioners. Although artists applaud the efforts of these volunteer managers, many voiced concern that the system has led to corrupt practices. It is clear that having a working Street Artist manage other Street Artists creates a conflict of interest. Creating a part-time Market Manager position will address these concerns and liberate the artists to focus on their business. The current lottery system creates inequitable outcomes as family unit members are permitted to enter the lottery as individuals. As a result, family units are able to secure multiple spaces in the market. The lottery system can be replaced with a quarterly assignment system based on a one-license, one-space model.

Approximate fiscal implications of each branding option are:
- Branded Kiosks: $63,175 - $108,300 (Based on research, kiosks range from $175-$300 each. Multiplied the individual price by 361 to reflect the number of spaces currently in Market areas.)
2.3 Participating artists are given a platform to show their work in the SFAC Galleries

The SFAC currently manages three art exhibition sites in the city’s Civic Center District. The SFAC Galleries make contemporary art accessible to broad audiences by commissioning new works, collaborating with arts and community organizations, and supporting artist’s projects. A permanent gallery platform promoting Street Artist work aligns with the mission and vision of both the Galleries Program and SAP. Street Artists should be given the opportunity to submit their work for consideration to a public panel. A specific display should be reserved for the presentation of Program artists’ work.

2.4 Clarify program purpose with accurate name, SFAC Urban Arts Market

The term “Street Artist” is generally understood as a vernacular term referring to artists that make public art – murals and graffiti. A simple method of building public awareness of this arts program is to establish a name that clearly communicates the program purpose. There are many potential program names that encapsulate program purpose and outcome: SFAC Urban Arts Market; SFAC Art & Craft Market; SFAC Art & Craft Vendor Program are a few.

Emeryville Art Exhibition

Administrator: Public Sector - The city of Emeryville
Frequency of Market Days: 3 week event held annually
Number of Vendors: Approximately 117
Description of Promising Practice:
For the past nine years, the Emeryville City Council has approved a Purchase Award Program in connection with the Annual Emeryville Art Exhibition. A selection panel reviews the works in the exhibition and makes a recommendation for the Purchase Award. With the approval of the City Council, the artwork selected becomes part of the City’s permanent collection displayed at City Hall.

This coordination of municipal resources increases positive outcomes across programs – diversifying the Emeryville’s collection and promoting local artists to a broad community.

- Market Canopies: $36,100 - $90, 250 (Based on research, canopies range from $100-$250 each. Multiplied the individual price by 361 to reflect the number of spaces currently in Market areas.)
- Branded boards and signs at market entrances and exits: $630 - $1260 (Based on research, branded signs range from $35-$70 each. Multiplied the individual price by 18 to reflect an average of six entrances/exits in three Market areas.)
Enhance Program services to support professional artists

3.1 Establish Capacity Building and Technical Assistance opportunities for artists to share their practice and learn new skills

Program participants should be offered capacity building and technical assistance opportunities that focus on the specific needs of professional artists. Topics could span from marketing and promotion issues - for example website development, or social media strategy - and skills building courses - for example metallurgy, pattern-making, or color theory.

SAP should coordinate the capacity building workshops with the technical assistance components of other SFAC programs. Additionally, skill sharing could be extended to the broader community through the Arts Education Program.

Next Steps: Implementation Feasibility and Timeline

The next step in improving Program alignment with the Agency’s goals for the future is to embark on a feasibility study that analyzes the administrative, political, legal, and fiscal implications of the recommendations detailed in this report. In addition, this analytical stage should focus on identifying a step-by-step process and timeline to implement these recommendations.

Juried selection, market promotion, and establishing the Commission as the final arbiter of appeals are currently restricted by the Program ordinance. Juried selection, and the market model defined in this report have staffing implications that will impact the Program budget. Branding the art markets and implementing a promotional strategy will carry fiscal implications and impact administrative roles and responsibilities. A thorough analysis of the various implications and consequent feasibility of these recommendations is necessary to define a reasonable implementation timeline.

Conclusion

The SFAC has the opportunity to craft an innovative Program that promotes the employment of hundreds of local artists, supporting independent artists to build sustainable businesses in San Francisco. As a continued effort to assess participant needs and program impacts, the SFAC should begin this transition with a feasibility study followed by a convening of program artists to gather their insights on implementing the recommendations outlined in this report. These artists have extensive experience working in art & craft markets across the nation. Their insights and expertise will prove invaluable in ensuring a successful transition to a contemporary market model.

With the implementation of the simplified market model, juried-selection, and gallery promotion, the SFAC needs to remain vigilant about maintaining equity as the program becomes more competitive. SAP is an equitable training ground for artists of diverse training, experience, and resources. Improving quality-control mechanisms does not need to curb this artistic diversity. Careful and transparent selection criteria will mitigate potential equity impacts.

As a vibrant and diverse arts market – SAP is poised to enliven our city, make high-quality art experiences equitable and easily accessible, and create fertile ground for building socially-diverse and politically engaged communities of artists and neighbors. By addressing the key program issues outlined in this report, and closing the gaps between program impacts and the SFAC’s priority goals, SAP can play a central role in furthering the SFAC’s mission and vision for the city and county of San Francisco. In addition, by utilizing a contemporary market model and promoting the political and social relevance of this artisan market, the SFAC can reinvigorate the Street Artist Program and establish a modern urban arts market that reflects the passion of the program’s founders and the city’s need for diverse, high-quality art.
